EARN A COLLEGE DEGREE IN THREE YEARS

At Methodist College it is now possible to earn a Bachelor's degree in three years. Highly-qualified high school graduates entering the college in a new program which begins this fall may, in effect, by-pass their freshman year.

As explained by college officials, the new "three-year program" can reduce the overall college-education cost by approximately one fourth. Reduction of time spent in the classroom could mean earlier entrance into graduate school for some, or into the job market for others.

Focal point of the new Methodist College plan is the College-Level Examination Program (CLEP), administered on a nationwide basis by the College Entrance Examination Board. Some 27 special subject examinations are already administered through CLEP, with others being added continually. Most of the examinations now offered cover academic courses normally undertaken in the freshman year of college. CLEP examinations are made up by boards of college professors who teach such courses. Examination standards are related directly to scores achieved by students enrolled in regular college courses in the same subjects and at the same level.

The examinations for the new program are offered in more than 59 major cities throughout the U.S. on a once-per-month basis, and in many other locations at varying intervals. Methodist College has applied for approval as a CLEP testing center on a limited basis, officials explained, and many other centers are expected to be opened throughout North Carolina in the near future. There is already one in operation at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte.

Program details have been worked out and explained by college officials. Here's how it will operate:

Any high school graduate who feels that his background already includes some work at the introductory level of undergraduate study, or who feels that he has a special competency in one or more such introductory fields, may for a small fee take one or more CLEP examinations in subjects of his choosing at a CLEP testing center.

If he wishes to enter Methodist College, he simply requests CLEP to forward his test scores to the College Registrar and submits his application for admission. If he has achieved a sufficiently high score on any examination approved by Methodist College, he will be given academic credit for the course covered, as though he had completed that course by attending college classes. Credits so earned will be counted toward requirements fulfilled for a Methodist College degree.

Since Methodist College specifies completion of 128 semester hours for a degree, average credits normally earned by any student in a single semester would be 16, or one eighth of the total. In the new program, approved recently by the college faculty and Board of Trustees, any student entering college for the first time will be permitted to complete up to 33 semester hours of CLEP subject examinations to apply toward his degree total. This would be the virtual equivalent of one full year (two semesters) of college work for credit, officials explained.

The new three-year program does not mean simply crowding into three years, by use of summer sessions, what the student would normally complete in four full years of regular college work. Successful scores on approved examinations would mean complete by-passing of equivalent courses in the college program, with the same amount of credit attained.

However, officials pointed out that only the exceptional student will be able to completely by-pass his freshman year via the CLEP route. A larger number of students will be able to pass examinations leading to credits of less than the 33 semester-hour maximum, but such students may either utilize the college's summer sessions or seek approval for taking more than 16 to 17 semester hours of work during the regular college semester in order to bridge the gap and complete a baccalaureate degree program within three academic years.

Since some CLEP examinations are also available at the sophomore level, the exceptional student possibly may complete part of his freshman and part of his sophomore requirements with CLEP examinations. Subject areas in which examinations are now offered include: history, English literature, science, sociology, psychology, education, economics and business and mathematics. Methodist College, in establishing its new plan, will be participating in a national program involving some 1,000 colleges and universities.

Adoption of the new plan is an addition to Methodist College's present academic program, and not a substitution. The College will continue to offer its basic four-year program leading to Bachelor of Arts and Bachelor of Science degrees. The three-year program is optional; the brighter student can travel faster, if he desires, and can avoid possible repetition of material in certain fields which he might have already covered in his high school program. In addition, faculty, to some extent, might be freed of introductory assignments and given greater opportunity to work at more advanced instructional levels.

According to Dr. Samuel J. Womack, Academic Dean of Methodist College, "It is hoped that the primary benefit to follow upon adoption of such a program will be the attraction of a greater percentage of students with exceptional qualifications and abilities. The program should also eliminate the problem of the 'turned-off' freshman who becomes bored in his introductory classes." Dean Womack coordinated plans for the three-year program, which was developed by faculty committees and area staffs.

The time-shortened degree program is not "academic speed in a breeze." A student must meet more advanced academic demands and put in longer study hours. In many cases there might be less time for athletics, extracurricular events and socialization on campus. But today's student seems to welcome challenges. Methodist College offers another one.

EARN A COLLEGE DEGREE IN THREE YEARS

At Methodist College it is now possible to earn a Bachelor's degree in three years. ^{high school} Highly-qualified/graduates entering the College in a new program which begins this fall may in effect by-pass their freshman year.

As explained by College officials, the new "three-year program" can reduce the overall college-education cost by approximately one fourth. Reduction of time spent in the classroom could mean earlier entrance into graduate school for some, or into the job market for others.

Focal point of the new Methodist College plan is the College-Level Examination Program (CLEP), administered on a nationwide basis by the College Entrance Examination Board. Some 27 special subject examinations are already administered through CLEP, with others being added continually. Most of the examinations now offered cover academic courses normally undertaken in the freshman year of college. CLEP examinations are made up by boards of college professors who teach such courses. Examination standards are related directly to scores achieved by students enrolled in regular college courses in the same subjects and at the same level.

The examinations for the new program are offered in more than 59 (59) major cities throughout the U. S. on a once-per-month basis, and in many other locations at varying intervals. Methodist College has applied for approval as a CLEP testing center on a limited basis, officials explained, and many other centers are expected to be opened throughout North Carolina in the near future. There is already one in operation at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte.

Program details have been worked out and explained by College officials. Here's how it will operate:

① Any high school graduate who feels that his background already includes some work at the introductory level of undergraduate study, or who feels that he has a special competency in one or more such introductory fields, may for a small fee take one or more CLEP examinations in subjects of his choosing at a CLEP testing center. If he wishes to enter Methodist College, he simply requests CLEP to forward his test scores to the College Registrar and submits his application for admission. If he has achieved a sufficiently high score on any examination approved by Methodist College, he will be given academic credit for the course covered, as though he had completed that course by attending college classes. Credits so earned will be counted toward requirements fulfilled for a Methodist College degree.

his degree total. This would be the virtual equivalent of one full year (two semesters) of college work for credit," officials explained.

The new three-year program does not mean simply crowding into three years, by use of summer sessions, what the student would normally complete in four full years of regular college work. Successful scores on approved examinations would mean complete by-passing of equivalent courses in the college program, with the same amount of credit attained. However, ^{officials pointed out} it is recognized that only the exceptional student will be able to completely by-pass his freshman year via the CLEP route. A larger number of students will be able to pass examinations leading to credits of less than the 33 semester-hour maximum, but such students may either utilize the College's summer sessions or seek approval for taking more than 16 to 17 semester hours of work during the regular college semester in order to bridge the gap and complete a baccalaureate degree program within three academic years," officials said.

Since some CLEP examinations are also available at the sophomore level, the exceptional student possibly may complete part of his freshman and part of his sophomore requirements with CLEP examinations. Subject areas in which examinations are now offered include: history, English literature, science, sociology, psychology, education, economics, and business and mathematics. Methodist College, in establishing its new plan, will be participating in a national program involving some 1,000 colleges and universities.

Adoption of the new plan is an addition to Methodist College's present academic program, and not a substitution," officials said. The College will continue to offer its basic four-year program leading to Bachelor of Arts and Bachelor of Science degrees. The three-year program is optional: the brighter student can travel faster, if he desires, and can avoid possible repetition of material in certain fields which he might have already covered in his high school program. In addition, faculty, to some extent, might be freed of introductory assignments and given greater opportunity to work at more advanced instructional levels.

According to Dr. Samuel J. Womack, Academic Dean of Methodist College, "It is hoped that the primary benefit to follow upon adoption of such a program will be the attraction of a greater percentage of students with exceptional qualifications and abilities. The program should also eliminate the problem of the 'turned-off' freshman who becomes bored in his introductory classes." Dean Womack coordinated plans for the three-year program, which was developed by faculty committees and area staffs.

The time-shortened degree program is not "academic speed in a breeze." A student must meet more advanced academic demands and put in longer study hours. In many cases there might be less time for athletics, extracurricular events and socialization on campus. But today's student seems to welcome challenges. Methodist College offers another one.

Earn Your Degree in Three Years At Methodist College

A three-year degree program is now in effect at Methodist College. Area high school graduates with exceptional academic qualifications may speed up the educational process and cut the cost of a degree.

Methodist College hopes to change "turned-off" freshmen of the Now Generation into ~~xxxx~~ highly-motivated "instant sophomores."

Approved for the fall of 1972 and primarily designed for freshmen, the three-year program will run concurrently with the standard four-year program. In the new program academic credits will be awarded to students who successfully complete specific subject examinations of the College-Level Examination Program (CLEP) of the College Entrance Examination Board, based in New York. Some 27 specific subjects now are included in CLEP, a program being used by over 1,000 American colleges. Thus, ~~adequate~~ ^{adequate} scores on exams ^{examinations} in areas of history, literature, science, sociology, psychology, education, business ~~and~~ and economics and mathematics enable students to quickly "earn" up to 33 semester hours of college credits, ^{in the same} ~~in~~ freshman and sophomore-level courses, based on ~~what they learned in a High school~~ ^{pre-college} ~~accomplishment.~~

^{examinations cover} At Methodist College 128 ~~hours~~ semester hours are required for a Bachelor's degree. Since the average freshman completes 32 to 34 semester hours of academic credits in his first year of college, ~~by~~ a good student may bypass an entire year of college study and ~~eliminate~~ ^{repetition.}

Any number of courses may be waived.

But only exceptional students will ~~meet~~ ^{complete} the maximum. / As few as three semester hours ^{of one} course, may be eliminated through ~~examinations~~ ^{CLEP}, including courses in the freshman and sophomore category. ^{Later in the year,} Additional examinations from freshman and sophomore categories may be taken ~~later~~ until a maximum of 33 semester hours ~~are~~ is reached. The length of the college program can be reduced through ~~XX~~ ^{through} CLEP, summer session work and, in some cases, through overloads (taking more than 16 hours of work per semester).

For ~~exceptionally able~~ ^{by} students, ^{provides} the three-year program ~~is~~ a personal challenge and a source of motivation. Potentially, it will cut the cost ~~of~~ a college education by one fourth. It will eliminate ^{repetitiveness} ~~repetitiveness~~ without the loss of quality or ~~content~~ ^{con}. For example, if two freshmen excel in different subject areas, ^{after taking the CLEP} one student's academic curriculum of in-residence ~~courses~~ ^{markedly} will vary from that of the other student, though the two entered college together. ~~The program~~ ^{of the} CLEP provides an education ^{tailored to} individual ^{educational} needs. ~~are underscored~~ ^{by the CLEP} ~~through the use of~~

Dr. Samuel J. Womack, academic dean at Methodist, said,

"It is hoped that the primary benefit to follow upon adoption of such a program will be the attraction of a greater percentage of students with exceptional academic qualifications and abilities. ^{The program should also alleviate the problem of the turned-off freshmen who is loved in his first classes.} Womack has coordinated plans for the three-year program, which was recently approved by the faculty and Board of Trustees at Methodist. He said Methodist has applied for approval as a "limited" CLEP Center -- that is, it will administer certain CLEP examinations once or twice per year.

"Entering freshman, of course, would be expected to have utilized in advance the services of any one of the 59 or more regular testing centers operated by the CLEP program in major cities of the U. S., " ^{Womack} he said. (The nearest approved CLEP center is at UNC-Charlotte, where tests are given _____).

The time-shortened degree program is not academic speed with a breeze. Students will have greater academic demands, heavier course loads and longer study hours. ^{for many cases,} There will be less time for athletics, extracurricular events and

It is recognized, of course, that the number of sophomore-level examinations a student might be able to pass as a college freshman might well be quite limited. However, the entire program is designed to serve the interests of the abler student, who might well have exceptional background and qualifications in some subjects and for whom even sophomore-level courses might prove repetitious in terms of knowledge already acquired.

In order for a program of this kind to function, it would be essential that Methodist College be designated at least a "limited CLEP Center", where certain CLEP examinations could be administered to Methodist College students once or twice per year (e.g., during the Christmas holiday period, which now covers virtually three weeks, and during the spring holidays or in the summer vacation period). Entering freshmen, of course, would be expected to have utilized IN ADVANCE the services of any one of the 59 or more regular testing centers operated by the CLEP program in major cities of the U.S.

At the present time it is proposed that Methodist College utilize only CLEP examination credits in lieu of in-residence academic work for fulfillment of degree requirements in the "Three-Year Program." This would avoid the problem of trying to crowd into three years all of the contact-hours of work normally performed in a four-year program. However, since it is expected that virtually all students capable of succeeding in the "Three-Year Program" would be sufficiently above-average in their scholastic qualifications ~~so that they might easily be allowed to take academic over-loads in work done in residence~~ at Methodist College, if this would be useful in achievement of 128 semester-hours of credits in a three-year period.

Such a program should prove attractive to the exceptionally able student who desires a more intellectually challenging experience in his college years than traditional programs now afford. It should be attractive economically, in that it could, potentially, cut the cost of the college education by one-fourth. It would serve the interests of the more impatient members of the present college generation, who seem anxious to get an education in a hurry. It would avoid the dulling effects of the repetitiousness of college introductory courses if and when such courses overlap or duplicate entirely work taken at the secondary school level. It would permit the abler student to move more rapidly into areas of academic specialization in which he is actively interested and provide a greater degree of motivation. It would to some extent free faculty members from the more "routine" responsibilities of introductory courses and permit them to offer a higher percentage of upper-level courses which are more challenging to instructor and student alike.

It is proposed that Methodist College offer a new "Three-Year Degree Program" in addition to its present standard four-year program, through awarding of academic credits to students who successfully complete specific subject examinations of the College-Level Examination Program of the College Entrance Examination Board. Designed primarily for the entering freshman, the Methodist College program would provide for a maximum of 33 semester-hours of such examination credits, or roughly one-fourth of the total of 128 semester-hours of credits required for the Bachelor's degree. The average freshman will complete approximately 32 to 34 semester hours of academic credits in his first year of college. Thus, for those who achieve sufficiently high scores on examinations covering 33 semester hours of Methodist College credits, it is possible to bypass the freshman year entirely and begin immediately to enroll in sophomore year courses.

In the event that a student should not be able to complete all 33 semester hours of examination credits at his initial enrollment, he would be permitted to take CLEP examinations that are available later (including some at the sophomore level) until he had reached the maximum of 33 semester-hours of credits by such means. It would also be possible for the student to combine credits earned by examination with work completed in the summer sessions in order to qualify for the award of the degree at the end of three years.

For example, suppose an entering freshman has earned 12 semester-hours of credits via CLEP exams taken at or prior to his entrance upon residence work at Methodist College. At a designated time during his freshman year he might be able to take more CLEP examinations and earn an additional 12 semester hours of credits, either on freshman-level courses not yet taken in residence, or sophomore-level courses covered in the CLEP program. He might then enroll for a summer session at Methodist College and add 9 more semester-hours of credits, which would mean that at the end of his first year at Methodist College he would have gained a total of 33 semester hours of credits in addition to those earned as a resident student engaged in traditional class work. The net effect would be that of reducing the total time of his college involvement by one year.

Such a program, of course, could be successfully utilized only by the better student and hence would have somewhat limited application to the student population in general. The great majority would still find it necessary to follow the more traditional pathway to the degree, so little, if any, reduction of course offerings or class sections would automatically follow upon inauguration of the "Three-Year Program." It is hoped that the primary benefit to follow upon adoption of such a program will be the attraction of a greater percentage of students with exceptional academic qualifications and abilities.

Three-Year Degree Available at Methodist College

Contact: Jean Hutchinson, Assistant Director of Public Relations - 488-7110, Ext. 228

Highly-qualified high school graduates now may earn a Bachelor's degree in three years at Methodist College.

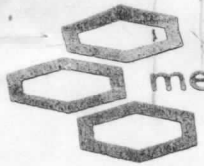

A new "three-year degree" program begins this fall. It is being made possible through the College-Level Examination Program (CLEP), administered on a nationwide basis by the College Entrance Examination Board. Over 1,000 colleges and universities in the United States are currently participating in the CLEP program.

In the program, students preparing to enter college for the first time may substitute examinations in some 27 special subject areas for freshman- and sophomore-level courses. Examinations are administered monthly at testing centers in more than 59 major cities throughout the U. S. Methodist College has applied for approval as a testing center.

According to college officials, a student in the new three-year program can reduce the overall college-education cost by approximately one fourth and enter graduate school or the job market earlier than the average student. Officials stressed, however, that only an exceptional, above-average student will be able to completely by-pass his freshman year in the CLEP program.

Further information about the new program is available through the Methodist College Registrar. (Call 488-7110, Ext. 220. Mr. S. R. Edwards is the Registrar.)

Dean's List Announced at Methodist

Miss J. Hutchinson, Assistant Director of Public Relations, 488-7110, Ext. 228

FAYETTEVILLE- - - - -

has been named to the first semester Dean's List at Methodist College in Fayetteville.

Academic Dean Dr. Samuel J. Womack stated that a student must earn a "B" or better average on 15 or more semester hours to qualify for the honor. From a student body of over 700, 155 students were named to the list at the twelve-year-old liberal arts college.
